England presented themselves to do homage at Westminster; but there was a long-standing custom against Jews (and women) being admitted to the coronation ceremony, and they were expelled during the banquet which followed the coronation, whereupon they were attacked by a crowd of bystanders.

History of the Jews in England (1066-1290) - Wikipedia

Jews, as the only outsiders in an otherwise homogeneous Christian society, were wards of the king. This meant that Jews came under the direct jurisdiction and protection of the crown, a status which allowed them, for example, freedom of the king's highways, exemption from tolls, the ability to hold land directly from the king, and physical protection in any of the vast network of royal ...
